ABSTRACT: The objective of this research is to formulate a novel marketing approach for a brand named Hijab Sabine. During the Covid-19 pandemic, the creative sub-industry, specifically the fashion sub-industry, experienced significant adverse effects. The Hijab Sabine brand is among those striving to recover and improve in the aftermath of the adverse effects of the Covid-19 pandemic. Over time, numerous new apparel businesses have emerged with product lines similar to that of Hijab Sabine. Although Hijab Sabine remains unchanged, new arrivals have shown greater progress. The primary factor responsible for this phenomenon is an inadequately developed marketing channel that has failed to adjust to the altered circumstances brought about by the COVID-19 pandemic. This study examines the issue at hand by conducting a comprehensive analysis of the brand's sales results through the use of external and internal analyses. The external analysis includes PESTEL, Porter's Five Forces, customer analysis, and competitor analysis, while the internal analysis involves an examination of the current STP, 4P marketing mix, VRIO, and BMC. The data for this study was obtained from in-depth interviews and observations. To summarize, the present study provides insights into the business strategy of Hijab Sabine and proposes recommendations for enhancing its marketing efforts and achieving success in the fiercely competitive market.

INTRODUCTION

Indonesia currently holds the distinction of having the largest Muslim population globally in 2022. As per a report published by The Royal Islamic Strategic Studies Center (RISSC), the estimated Muslim populace in Indonesia stands at 237.56 million. As a result, the scarf for head covering and Muslim dresses have grown in popularity in Indonesia. Previously, the Indonesia Islamic Fashion Consortium (IIFC) predicted that Indonesia would become the qibla of world Muslim fashion in 2020. The 2018-2019 report from the State of the Global Islamic Economy explained that Indonesia's Muslim fashion exports entered the world's top 3 categories after Turkey and the United Arab Emirates (UAE). Muslim wear has evolved from a religious and cultural movement to a fashion-savvy trend and booming industry. The increased demand for Islamic clothing has encouraged the growth of the domestic Muslim fashion industry. The sector has been transformed from its origins in home industries and small and medium enterprises (SMEs) to large-scale manufacturing today.

As per the statement of Airlangga Hartarto, the Minister of Industry, the Indonesian Muslim fashion market has an estimated worth of US$ 20 billion (equivalent to Rp. 280 trillion at an exchange rate of Rp. 14,000 per US dollar) and is experiencing an annual growth rate of 18.2%. The sector in question exhibits a growth rate that is threefold that of the national economy. As such, it is imperative that both online and offline support be extended to this sector. The minister himself cited the statement during the opening speech of the 2019 Muslim Fashion Festival. The COVID-19 pandemic has had a significant impact on the demand side, with domestic demand for textiles decreasing by 50% in 2020 (Arania, 2022). However, imports of textiles and apparel in Indonesia increased due to the pandemic, with the import value of special woven fabrics standing at US$ 12,797,291 and imports of textile goods suitable for industrial use reaching US$ 38,798,172 (Arania, 2022). BPS data shows that in May 2020, the value of this commodity reached US$ 37,256,567 with a total of 1,907,540 kilos (Arania, 2022, 8-9).

LITERATURE REVIEW

Five Stages of Market Adopter

Market adopters refers to the different groups of people who adopt a new product, idea, or technology over time (Rogers, 2003). that diverse groups of individuals absorb innovations in a predictable manner. Rogers classifies market adopters as innovators, early adopters, early majority, late majority, and laggards. Each group adopts new technologies differently. Early adopters—often opinion leaders and high-status people—follow innovators. The early majority adopts before the late majority, which is more hesitant and cautious. Laggards are the last to adopt, and may only do so out of necessity.

Everett Rogers' Five Stages of Technology Adoption, widely known as the Diffusion of Innovation, describes how markets acquire new technology (Christensen, 2016). Innovators—risk-takers and early experimenters—start the process. They love trying new items and ideas. Early Adopters, social opinion leaders, are the second stage. They weigh pros and cons before adopting new innovation. The pragmatic and deliberative Early Majority, the third stage, learns from innovators and early adopters before adopting. In the fourth stage, the Late Majority is more dubious and adopts a new technology once it's broadly accepted. Laggards reject change and prefer old techniques. New technology is only adopted when necessary or coerced. This paradigm illuminates innovation dissemination across commercial or social segments.

Despite these variations, both models stress the necessity of identifying groups of customers who adopt new products, technologies, and innovations. Businesses can improve their marketing and communication strategies to boost innovation uptake and success by identifying customer categories and their traits.

Marketing Strategy

Marketing can be defined as the process of creating, communicating, delivering, and exchanging offerings that have value for customers, clients, partners, and society at large (Walker & Mullins, 2013).

Business success requires a customer-focused marketing plan that coincides with the company's aims (Walker & Mullins, 2013). Here are some reasons why:

1. Differentiation: An organization can differentiate itself from competition by focusing on customer needs, wants, and preferences.
2. Customer Loyalty: Consumer-focused marketing helps establish consumer loyalty and relationships. An organization can improve customer satisfaction, repeat purchases, and positive word-of-mouth by understanding their needs and preferences and tailoring its services and communication.
3. Revenue Growth: customer-focused marketing can increase income by identifying new customer segments, expanding the reach of existing products and services, and boosting customer lifetime value.
4. Innovation: Organizations can find new market opportunities and create innovative products and services by listening to customers. This may lead to market-leading inventions.

A customer-focused marketing strategy is essential for organizations to understand and meet the needs of their customers, differentiate themselves from competitors, and achieve sustainable business growth and success (Belch & Belch, 2007).

Conducting comprehensive internal and external analyses is imperative for devising a successful marketing strategy (Walker & Mullins, 2013).

The company ought to commence by conducting an internal evaluation of its present marketing situation, appraising the efficacy of its marketing mix, sales performance, and profitability (Walker & Mullins, 2013). Comprehending the capabilities and resources of a company, encompassing its strengths, weaknesses, and core competencies, can offer valuable insights into the domains in which the company can achieve excellence (Walker & Mullins, 2013). Furthermore, the assessment of the corporate culture and financial status aids in the synchronization of marketing choices with the organizational principles and guarantees sufficient funds for marketing initiatives. Conducting thorough market analysis is crucial for businesses to gain insights into the external environment (Kotler, 2006). This process entails extensive research aimed at comprehending the market's dimensions, expansion potential, as well as the demands and inclinations of customers. Conducting an evaluation of competitors through an analysis of their strategies, strengths, and weaknesses can facilitate the identification of potential avenues for differentiation. The examination of macro-environmental factors, encompassing political, economic, social, technological, and legal dimensions, enables firms to proactively anticipate external impacts on their marketing tactics. Moreover, conducting an industry analysis facilitates the identification of prevailing patterns, prospects, and plausible hazards within the industry. Through the implementation of both internal and external analyses, organizations can formulate a thoroughly informed marketing strategy that is consistent with their available resources, capitalizes on market prospects, and establishes a competitive edge.
Affiliate Marketing

The core of affiliate marketing is enabling participants—so-called affiliates—to engage in commission-based sales activities via affiliate networks while remaining independent of the advertiser (sponsor) (Duffy, 2005). An affiliate is compensated financially (often in the form of a commission) for directing Internet users to a sponsor's offer when the sponsor is promoting its product on the affiliate's website (MAZUREK, 2011).

A successful conclusion for both parties is essential for an affiliate-advertiser collaboration in an affiliate marketing arrangement. By its very nature, affiliate marketing offers the possibility of a win-win outcome for all stakeholders. Advertisers are aware of the advantages of a sales force that only accepts commissions, and they also have predictable marketing costs. Affiliates have the chance to develop a revenue stream without making infrastructure or inventory investments. The only thing needed is the skill to design websites that are appealing enough to draw enough visitors who are interested in the goods and services offered by the affiliate's advertising (Duffy, 2005).

As it translates in direct marketing:

- The offer needs to be interesting and relevant for users who are presently deficient in this area.
- This strategy's potency and effectiveness are dependent on the presence of interested and open recipients (small enterprises) (Tumwesigye, 2008).

Branding

A brand is more than just a name or logo, and includes intangible assets such as brand associations, perceptions, and emotions that are associated with the brand. (Joachimsthaler & Aaker, 2000). Aaker posits that branding encompasses a collection of assets and liabilities that are associated with a brand name and symbol. These assets and liabilities can either enhance or detract from the value that a product or service provides to a company and/or its customers. Branding refers to the visceral response that individuals experience in relation to a particular product, service, or entity (Neumeier, 2006).

Branding is strategic for organizations and creates a unique and valuable brand identity, according to Neumeier's definition. Branding requires a thorough understanding of the target audience's needs and values. Customer loyalty, sales, and brand equity can increase (Neumeier, 2006).

Integrated Marketing Communication

Integrated Marketing Communication (IMC) is a strategic approach to marketing that involves coordinating and integrating all communication channels to deliver a consistent and persuasive message to target audiences (Belch & Belch, 2007). Refer to Belch, IMC is a strategic business process that plans, develops, executes, and analyzes coordinated, quantifiable, convincing brand communication programs for consumers, customers, prospects, employees, associates, and other significant external and internal audiences.

IMC integrates and aligns marketing communications across channels to produce synergy. To give the target audience a consistent brand experience. Companies can boost consumer recall and recognition by synchronizing advertising, sales promotion, public relations, direct marketing, and other communication strategies (Kotler, 2006). By coordinating these channels, marketers can create a more effective and persuasive message that resonates with the target audience and builds brand equity.

The concept of IMC is about integrating all communication channels to create a consistent, coordinated, and effective message that builds brand equity and engages with the target audience (Kotler, 2006).

Integrated marketing communication (IMC) pertains to the synchronized and harmonious utilization of diverse marketing communication tools and platforms to communicate an integrated brand message to targeted audiences (Kotler, 2006). Kotler's IMC strategy relies on distribution channels:

- Consistency of message: Distribution channels let brands communicate with consumers. Companies can strengthen their brand image and value proposition by aligning their message across advertising, sales promotions, public relations, and personal selling. Consistency boosts brand awareness and consumer trust.
- Research and exposure: Distribution channels boost a brand's marketing communication. Retail, e-commerce, wholesalers, and distributors reach a wider audience. Companies may boost brand awareness and client engagement by using these platforms.
Customer engagement: Distribution channels allow organizations to collect feedback, answer questions, and personalize experiences. Companies can create memorable brand experiences by putting marketing communication elements into distribution channels, such as product displays, packaging, point-of-sale materials, or interactive technologies.

Channel partner and collaboration: Retailers, wholesalers, and distributors collaborate in distribution networks. IMC strategies must link communication goals with channel partners. Channel partners may effectively communicate the brand's value offer to customers by receiving consistent messaging, promotional support, and training. Collaboration improves brand consistency and consumer experience.

Feedback and market intelligence: Distribution channel provide market intelligence and feedback. Customers, channel partners, and intermediaries provide consumer preferences, purchasing behavior, and market trends. Feedback can improve IMC targeting, messaging, and channel selection.

Brand Awareness VS Customer Purchase

Awareness of a brand is essential for influencing consumer decisions and ultimately generating sales (Shahid, 2017). Consumers are more likely to buy products from brands with which they are familiar and have positive impressions. An increase in market share, profits, and shareholder value can result from building a strong brand with high recognition. Effective advertising, promotions, and sales can all increase brand awareness. As stated in, even if consumers desire to purchase a particular product, brand recognition will remain the most significant and influential factor in their purchase decision. Therefore, it is essential for businesses to prioritize developing and maintaining brand awareness in order to increase sales.

Customer Journey

The customer journey is the whole of a customer's interactions with a company. It covers everything from product awareness and consideration to purchase, post-buy support, and continuing involvement (Bodine & Manning, 2012).

AIDA Formula

The AIDA formula is considered a structured approach to crafting marketing communications that are impactful and persuasive (Belch & Belch, 2007). The acronym AIDA denotes Attention, Interest, Desire, and Action, which outlines a hierarchical model of effects that a communication message ought to strive to attain. Below is a comprehensive analysis of each individual stage:

1. Attention: The first step in the AIDA formula is to capture the audience's attention.
2. Interest: Once you have the audience's attention, the next step is to generate interest in your product or service.
3. Desire: The third step in the AIDA formula is to create a desire for your product or service.
4. Action: The final step in the AIDA formula is to prompt the audience to take action. This can be done by including a clear call-to-action that directs the audience to do something, such as buy your product, sign up for your service, or visit your website.

Five A of Customer Journey Path

the "Five A's" in marketing. This paradigm is centered on each stage the customer experiences while interacting with a product or service (Mahayanti, 2022). The Five A's generally consist of:

1. Awareness: At this stage, potential clients are made aware of a product or service. In order to generate interest and draw attention, it involves marketing operations including advertising, public relations, and content marketing.
2. Attraction: The second phase is to entice clients to a product or service after they have learned about it. Convincing message, distinctive value propositions, and convincing marketing strategies can help with this. The objective is to appeal to the target market with the product or service.
3. Acquisition: During this phase, possible customers who are interested are turned into paying customers. It could involve doing things like buying something, subscribing to something, or starting a business deal. The conversion process will be seamless and enjoyable, with that being the main goal.
4. Activation: Following acquisition, the activation stage seeks to guarantee that users begin utilizing the product or service successfully and onboarding goes without a hitch. In this phase, the emphasis is on promoting the customer success, offering the required direction, and addressing any first challenges or queries.
5. Advocacy: The last step of the customer journey is advocacy, where happy consumers turn into brand ambassadors and spread the word about the good or service to others. Excellent customer service, loyalty programs, referral rewards, and a great customer experience overall may all generate advocacy.

Customer Relation Management

In the realm of Customer Relationship Management (CRM), the term “customer relations” pertains to the various forms of communication, transactions, and associations that take place between a business entity and its customers (Buttle, 2015). Customer relationship management (CRM) refers to the various strategies and approaches utilized by businesses to establish, sustain, and improve connections with their customers (Buttle, 2015).

RESEARCH METHODOLOGY

Data Collection Method

Gather information that will be useful in addressing the research questions and achieving the study goals. Based on the research concept, the type of data required, the resources available, and the ethical issues involved, the data collection methods are chosen (Creswell, 2014).

In this case the author obtains data from within the company directly by interviewing employees and the owner and observing via social media. Thus the data which the authors get are primary data and secondary data. To ensure a representative sample, the author will randomly select employees from different departments and random targeted customers. These individuals can provide valuable insights into their experiences with Hijab Sabine's. To gather more in-depth information, the author will conduct interviews with a subset of the respondents. These interviews will be semi-structured, allowing for open-ended questions and follow-up probing to gain a deeper understanding of their perspectives. Primarily, the goal is to obtain a diverse and representative sample of respondents to provide a comprehensive analysis of Hijab Sabin’s brand image and sales.

The purpose of the data analysis approach is to interpret the gathered data and provide answers to the research questions. The research strategy will determine the data analysis approach used (Creswell, 2014).

In this part the author will analyze the data qualitatively. The purpose of qualitative data analysis is to understand non-numerical data and to find themes, patterns, and classifications within the data by doing an in-depth interview. Typically, there are 5-25 people involved in an in-depth interview (Creswell, 2014). Content analysis, rooted theory, and discourse study are common methodologies used in qualitative data analysis. The Hijab Sabine management team and targeted customers will be interviewed for this research.

1. Hijab Sabine Internal Management: Interviews will include conversations and perspectives from the internal management team. Stakeholders include the owner, marketing manager, sales manager, and others in total are 2 interviewees. These interviews will reveal the brand’s USPs, competitive advantage, and marketing resources.

2. Hijab Sabine Targeted Customers: The interviews will also include in-depth discussions with the targeted customers and existing customer with total interviewee are 10 person. Hijab-wearing ladies interested in women's fashion will be interviewed for this brand. These interviews seek feedback on brand impression, purchasing behavior, preferred communication methods, and buying influences. These interviews will assist the IMC approach reach and engage the target audience, increasing sales.

Data Analysis Method

The purpose of the data analysis approach is to interpret the gathered data and provide answers to the research questions. The research strategy will determine the data analysis approach used (Creswell, 2014). The author conducted an analysis and categorized it into two types: external analysis and internal analysis. The external analysis included PESTEL analysis, customer analysis, competitor analysis, and Porter's Five Forces analysis. During the internal analysis, the author performed various analytical techniques such as STP analysis, 4P Marketing mix analysis, VRIO analysis, and an evaluation of the current Business Model Canvas of Hijab Sabine.
FINDING AND DISCUSSION

PESTEL analyzes political, economic, social, technical, environmental, and legal variables. Analyzing these factors helps companies understand the external business environment and identify opportunities and threats that could affect their business and marketing strategy. Strategic planning sometimes uses PESTEL (Political, Economic, Social, Technology, Environment, Legal) analysis to discover external issues that may affect the company’s operations (Kotler et al, 2006).

Political factor: Government laws and regulations affect the apparel industry. Trade, taxation, labor, and import-export legislation can affect business operations and profitability. Indonesia hiked textile and garment import taxes in 2021 to safeguard domestic businesses. This move raised production costs and limited access to competitively priced materials for local brand apparel firms.

Economic factor: COVID-19 and economic woes lowered Indonesian consumer morale. Consumer caution and low confidence cost local fashion brands sales and spending. Despite the economy’s recovery, Indonesia's middle class and disposable income have grown. Local garment brands now have more customers, improving sales and market growth. Indonesia's increasing economy boosts fashion consumption and discretionary income. Local clothing brands have benefited from this trend. Covid-19 benefited and hurt online enterprises. Retail and online sales effect local clothing brands. Online shopping and retail expansion boost sales and market penetration. Indonesian e-commerce has grown due to online buying platforms and consumer demand. Local brands can now sell nationwide.

Social factor: COVID-19 boosted Indonesia's online retail. Local fashion brands with strong online presences and effective delivery systems sustained sales and consumer involvement during lockdowns and other limitations. Social media, influencer culture, and COVID-19 technology have transformed brand discovery and engagement. Influencers and social media raise brand awareness. Indonesians value eco-friendly and sustainable fashion. Socially conscious consumers buy local clothing labels that promote ethical manufacture, ecological sourcing, and eco-aware communication. Local brand garment makers are known for their CSR, community support, and ethical labor standards. Responsible consumers like this. Indonesia's rich cultural past makes traditional clothing popular. Local brands that incorporate traditional textiles, themes, or crafting processes attract culturally authentic customers.

Technological factor: Local brand apparel firms need social media and digital marketing. Social media can reach more people, develop compelling content, and establish their online presence. Local brand apparel firms can advertise their items, communicate with customers, and market niche on social media. Digital marketing helps companies reach and retain customers. Customer data and data analytics can reveal consumer behavior, tastes, and market trends. Local garment brands can utilize data analytics to understand client preferences, estimate demand, and modify products. Customer insights allow businesses to tailor marketing and offer products that fit customer needs.

Environmental factor: Environmental sustainability and consumer desire for eco-friendly products affect local brand clothes. Eco-friendly products and practices can enhance brand recognition and attract eco-conscious customers. Businesses that use recycled or organic materials, eco-friendly production methods, and ethical sourcing have an edge. These enterprises satisfy consumers’ green preferences. Fashion firms can reduce textile waste, increase recycling, and find new ways to reuse or upcycle materials. These efforts promote circular, sustainable production.

Legal factor: Product descriptions, pricing, and customer service are protected by Indonesian consumer legislation. Local clothing makers must follow these laws to avoid controversy and keep clients. Local brand apparel companies must obey advertising and marketing laws to be honest, moral, and industry-compliant. Indonesia controls advertising for consumer protection and fairness. Local brand apparel companies must follow these laws in their advertising and marketing.

Porter’s 5 Forces Analysis

Porter’s 5 Forces A tool for analyzing the competitive factors that affect industry profitability is Porter's 5 factors analysis (Porter, 1980). There are five forces in the framework:

1. Threat of new entrants: High

This refers to the potential for new competitors to enter the market and challenge established businesses. The industry becomes more competitive and less profitable as the threat of new competitors increases. Indonesian women's Muslim clothing has few... entrance obstacles, such as low capital needs or little government control, which can entice new players. Hijab Sabine can, however, stave off new competitors by upholding client loyalty and differentiating itself by distinctive designs, high quality, and focused message provided it has a solid brand reputation, a committed customer base, and a good marketing communications strategy.

2. Bargaining Power of Suppliers: High
   This testifies to how much power suppliers have influenced the cost and calibre of inputs. The potential of suppliers to raise prices and lower industry profitability increases with their bargaining strength. In Indonesia, there are numerous providers of textiles, components, and accessories for Muslim women's clothing, which weakens the supplier's negotiating position. Their bargaining power may be greater if there are fewer suppliers or if they have exclusive materials or designs. In such circumstances, Hijab Sabine must focus on preserving solid relationships with suppliers, looking into different sourcing possibilities, and negotiating advantageous terms.

3. Bargaining power of Buyers: Mid
   This relates to the level of control consumers have on the cost and calibre of things. Buyer bargaining power determines how much lower prices businesses may set and how profitable an industry is. Customers have more options and more negotiating power because there are many competitors in the market offering comparable products. Hijab Sabine could tackle this by concentrating on building brand loyalty through efficient marketing communications, providing top-notch customer service, and developing distinctive value propositions that speak to customers' wants and desires.

4. Threat of substitutes: Low
   This refers to the point at which similar consumer wants can be met by other goods or services. The lower the price that businesses may charge and the less profitable the industry, the greater the threat of alternatives. Women's traditional attire, non-Muslim fashion labels, and custom tailoring are examples of acceptable alternatives to Muslim clothing for women. Hijab Sabine can draw attention to the cultural value of wearing Muslim clothing, its distinctive designs, and its high quality to reduce the threat. Their likelihood of moving to alternatives can be decreased by clearly expressing the advantages and values of the brand, which can help them feel strongly connected to it.

5. Intensity of competitive rivalry: High
   This represents the level of competitiveness between the industry's current businesses. The profitability of an industry declines as competition intensifies. There are numerous well-known Muslim women's clothing brands in Indonesia, which suggests there is fierce competition. Hijab Sabine can use its integrated marketing communications strategy to generate brand awareness, develop a captivating message, interact with customers through numerous channels, and provide a distinctive value proposition in order to stand out from the competition. Hijab Sabine can keep a competitive edge and entice new customers by consistently inventing and staying ahead of rivals.

Customer Analysis

In order to identify the most lucrative client categories and create marketing strategies that cater to their demands, customer analysis is a crucial part of marketing strategy (Kotler, 2006). It entails gathering and analyzing data on consumer demographics, behaviors, wants, and preferences. To compile the data, the author used some in-depth interviews and netnography analysis to target loyal customers of Hijab Sabine.

Interviewees' stakeholder interactions. Customer interviews and social media research established Hijab Sabine's target demographic. Urban and suburban 27–50-year-old women are the population. Hijab Sabine targets compact, fashion-conscious, quality-conscious individuals. Consumers choose sustainable, ethical products. Hijab Sabine will market to its demographics. The headscarf that combine style, comfort, and adaptability allow the individuals in concern to express their individuality while adhering to modest fashion. Hijab Sabine customers want high-quality fabrics that last and breathe, as well as a variety of patterns and colors to match different outfits and events. These preferences will guide Hijab Sabine's product development and assortment planning to meet its target audience's needs.

Customer journey mapping taught the author about touchpoints and stages. Consumer decision-making encompasses discovering, assessing, buying, and commenting on the experience. Author identified touchpoints. Social media, online stores, physical stores, customer service, and influencer referrals are touchpoints. Hijab Sabine may increase customer happiness and loyalty by understanding the client journey and providing a seamless and consistent experience at every touchpoint.
Customer feedback and sentiment studies show Hijab Sabine's customer experience. Quality, innovation, and inclusiveness customers. Customer service, personalized recommendations, and cross-platform purchase are valued. Customers want speedy shipment, easy returns, and support. Based on these observations, the author wants to improve customer service, optimize online and physical shopping experiences, and create tools to decrease pain spots. This analysis identified Hijab Sabine's customer base. Customer demographics, demands, preferences, customer journey, and customer experience will inform the integrated marketing communications plan. To increase brand awareness and sales, the author provides a seamless and personalized customer experience that connects with Hijab Sabine's target market. Through focused messaging, improved touchpoints, and outstanding customer service, the author hopes to establish Hijab Sabine as a trusted and preferred women's fashion brand and build brand loyalty.

Competitor Analysis

Competitor analysis is essential to creating a solid marketing plan. The procedure comprises collecting and analyzing competitive landscape data including competitor strengths and weaknesses. By studying their competition, companies can create strategies to stand out (Kotler, 2006). The greatest way to defeat the competition is to quit trying to beat the competition (Kim & Mauborgne, 2005). Instead, create new market space to eliminate the competitor. Value innovation can create new markets and eliminate competition. Primary, in the competitor analysis, the author will use the 4P marketing mix analysis. In this case, the author will focus on how competitors drive their awareness to drive sales and customer acquisition with keep on eye to brand namely Button Scarves, Kami and Kineka.

The essential component of the brand analysis for Button Scarves, KAMI Idea, and Kienka as competitors of Hijab Sabine in the context of developing an integrated marketing communications strategy to boost brand awareness and sales of women's apparel can be summarized as follows:

1. Brand Awareness
   In their respective markets, all three brands are well-known. Customers are familiar with the brands and can quickly recognize and link them to the distinctive goods, designs, and characteristics they offer.

2. Brand Image and Positioning
   While KAMI Idea concentrates on innovation and versatility in women's clothing and Kienka emphasizes elegance and timelessness in fashion, Button Scarves advertises itself as a distributor of versatile scarves with inventive designs. These brand positioning and imagery aid in differentiating the brands and highlighting their distinctive offerings to their intended market.

3. Customer perception of quality
   The brands above are known for their use of premium fabrics, attention to detail, and production of well-made, long-lasting clothing.

4. Competitive differentiation
   Each brand distinguishes itself from peers with its own special selling qualities. It might be the use of buttons by Button Scarves, the emphasis on creativity and adaptability by KAMI Idea, or the emphasis on refinement and timelessness by Kienka. These distinguishing qualities help the brand stand out from the competition and forge a distinctive identity in the marketplace.

5. Word-of-mouth and customer advocacy
   Customers who have experienced the distinctive qualities of each brand, such as the button-based designs of Button Scarves, the cutting-edge selections of KAMI Idea, or the classic style of Kienka, can become strong brand advocates, spreading positive recommendations and boosting customer loyalty.

6. Communication channel and Touch point
   The brands communicate with their target audience through a variety of communication channels and touchpoints, including online platforms, social media, influencer partnerships, retail locations, online advertising, customer engagement as build as email marketing and PR. With the use of these channels and touchpoints, they are able to communicate meaningfully with clients at different times throughout their customer journey.

4P Marketing Mix Analysis

The 4Ps of marketing, generally known as the essential components of the marketing mix, form the marketing mix and help companies create effective marketing strategies that meet customer needs (Kotler, 2006). Breakdown bellow:
Table II. Current 4P Marketing Mix of Hijab Sabine

1. Product

The good, service, or concept that a business gives to its clients is known as the product. It consists of features, design, quality, branding, and packaging (Kotler, 2006).

Hijab Sabine has provided a range of merchandise including blouses, shirts, tunics, long shirts that extend to the base of the knees, women's robes, headscarves, and prayer-related items since its inception. The brand Hijab Sabine exhibits a distinctiveness in its production of motifs, which are based on the brand's desired characteristics. Specifically, floral patterns are utilized in combination with pastel hues. In 2022, Hijab Sabine introduced monogram motifs to align with prevailing fashion trends, thereby augmenting the brand's distinctiveness. Hijab Sabine selects lightweight materials that impart a cool sensation, as they are well-suited to the prevailing climate in Indonesia. In addition, Hijab Sabine provides a variety of products that are suitable for travel, including compact prayer kits and lightweight garments in neutral hues. The subsequent elements are noteworthy distinguishing features of Hijab Sabine in comparison to other brands.

2. Price

Price is how much a buyer pays for a product or service. The price plan, promotions, payment terms, and other factors affect the product's perceived worth (Kotler, 2006).

Hijab Sabine's pricing strategy is determined by the cost of fundamental materials involved in the manufacturing process, while also incorporating the worth of genuine personalized patterns offered by the brand. Nevertheless, these prices have been modified to align with those of rival companies.

3. Place

Distribution describes how a thing is sold. Distribution channels include physical stores, internet marketplaces, and others (Kotler, 2006).

The outcomes of the interviews conducted with both internal and external stakeholders of Hijab Sabine have indicated a positive reception towards the brand. Additionally, respondents expressed a desire for increased product offerings and wider availability of retail locations across various distribution channels. At present, Hijab Sabine lacks a diverse range of distribution channels. With respect to the aforementioned observation, it can be inferred that the process of brand awareness is impeding the process of purchasing goods.
4. Promotion

Promotion is how a business persuades its target market to buy its products or services. It includes sales promotions, public relations, personal selling, and others (Kotler, 2006).

According to the findings of online observation and internal interviews, it appears that Hijab Sabine's promotional activities are primarily focused on e-commerce campaigns, such as the twin date campaign. In terms of offline promotions, the company seems to rely solely on simple price discounts, without any associated campaign.
